

Ledger Road — World Export

World Overview

- The party found evidence of recent occupation in Blackstone, including cook fires, stacked crates, and fresh boot prints, as well as a stable with no horses.
- The party has witnesses to escort east and plans to protect them while searching for Lady Cairn in Ilyr's Gate and determining Lysa's knowledge of forged Ardwine seal.
- Captain Rennic Vale is an Aster Table officer who surrendered during the infiltration of Blackstone. He knows about closure terms and claims the Aster Table is preventing 'the under-road' from opening fully. He mentioned that civilian copyists were used generations ago to maintain names in the closure ledger, but recent names should not be possible. When shown Mara Renn's letter, he expressed concern that someone has been feeding the road again.
- Tovin burned some old dispatch records during combat with ink wretches, causing consequences for the party.
- The party is preparing to travel to Brackenford as Pell's mirror image suggests the original job loop is not closed.
- The under-road remains closed but acknowledged. Central court may still try to seal Caul's trial. Kestrel immediately began planning how to steal trial transcripts someday. Some Sable Year names remain unknown. Vey and Bran's promised visit/play remains unresolved.
- The session ended with a messenger from Brackenford arriving, indicating that Pell has locked himself in the toll office and the milestones are warm.
- Toll-Seventeen-West is an upland weigh station beyond Blackstone where blue asters grow.
- The party met in Brackenford at The Three Eels, where Master Pell Ardwine hired them to carry a sealed ledger case to Ilyr's Gate. The group consisted of Mara Vale the ex-soldier fighter, Tovin Reed the human wizard, Sister Elian the cleric of the River Saint, Kestrel the half-elf rogue, and Bran Calder the ranger. They found three wax seals on the ledger case: Ardwine Mercantile, the Brackenford council stamp, and an older imperial sunburst mark. They accepted the job after negotiating hazard pay. On the road, they found signs of an abandoned camp belonging to a missing courier and were ambushed by three bandits and a trained mastiff. They captured one bandit, Jory Pike, who claimed they were hired to scare couriers off. The session ended with Tovin noticing the ledger case was faintly warm near the old imperial seal.
- The party saved Hal during their encounter in the dispatch room, improving their trust with Commander Holt slightly.
- Yip-of-the-Root is a goblin who accepted a tea kettle as a toll and provided the party with a route through the thorn-choked moat during their infiltration of Blackstone.
- The west bridge chamber's main mechanism is a road-switch that can divert under-road traffic between Blackstone, Glass Quay, Brackenford, and deeper capital vaults, allowing Caul to redirect obligations and people into legal custody.
- The party encountered two blue-coated guards and one road construct during their infiltration of Blackstone, leading to a chaotic combat situation.
- The session ended with the road-switch damaged, water rising slowly, and only one route open leading deeper toward the customs hall, creating a time pressure before Caul's presentation.
- The party's reputation is complicated, as they are seen as heroes to some and criminals to others.
- The party lost one crate of lamp oil during the crossing of a washed-out bridge, but two flasks survived.
- The list of Blackstone dead from Sable Year contains only 43 names, which is not enough for a fort evacuation or plague.
- The party plans to return to Ilyr's Gate to inspect the sealed bridge chamber beneath the west bridge.
- The party encountered an abandoned shrine at Saint Orlan's, where they met Dobb Renn and experienced the ringing of the shrine bell at night.
- The party discovered a hidden stair beneath a road marker labeled XVII after using a road token near an imperial milestone. The stair sealed itself shortly after being revealed.

- The party used a funeral disguise to deceive lock guards at a lock station, using sacks, chalk, and a saint-medal from Blackstone.
- The party must return proof to the capital, and there are outstanding plot threads including the need to publicly expose the Sable Year truth and protect the freed copyists on their return.
- The session ended with the under-road bells ringing once and then stopping across the city for the first quiet night in weeks after the public account was accepted.
- The party decided to hide witnesses at the River Saint cathedral and investigate the Glass Quay quietly instead of going straight to Lysa.
- The party encountered blue-lacquer scouts tracking them west of the bridge, indicating they are being shadowed.
- The campaign takes place in Veyr, a damp river kingdom built over older imperial roads, buried toll shrines, and frontier forts that nobody has had the money to maintain properly in two generations. Trade is controlled by guild ledgers and river charters, but the old border country is starting to behave strangely again.
- Glass Quay account numbers match names of missing clerks.
- A child saw a 'black wagon without horses' moving at dawn near Harrow Bend.
- The phrase 'road beneath the road' is introduced as part of the investigation into Mara Renn's disappearance.
- The party's encounter involved crown surveyors and two hired mages who fought to control route lines, with the party successfully capturing one surveyor and damaging the road-switch during the conflict.
- The party discovered that Fort Blackstone may have been awaiting relief since the Sable Year.
- The party is currently camped near the sealed stair marker after their travel session.
- Blue aster petals were used as a calling card for someone hunting old ledger page 17s.
- The party plans to return to Ilyr's Gate publicly with church bells, witnesses, and receipts.
- The party avoided an ambush by Cairnwell agents wearing stolen Aster blue coats by sending Button with noisy pots down the obvious path while they took a ridge trail.
- Mara Vale's family connection remains unresolved.
- The party leveled to 4 after a long rest in the toll house, ending the session quietly with Dobb and Mara Renn sharing terrible camp tea and Button trying to eat blue asters.
- The party discovered blue asters growing unnaturally in the toll office despite no sunlight.
- During the infiltration, Tovin cast Detect Magic and discovered faint transmutation magic under the stable floor in Blackstone.
- The party discovered that Auditor-Marshal Caul is located at the Deep Charter Vault beneath the old customs hall, where he is preparing to present a sanitized road account to royal envoys, potentially framing the party as rogue auditors.
- Dobb Renn's daughter wanted to see the sea and hated onions, which adds depth to his character.
- The toll office in Brackenford has moving ledger script spreading across the floorboards, and the session ends with the party standing at the toll office door where the campaign's missing page trail began.
- The party believes they have been hired to escort a disputed merchant ledger from the river town of Brackenford to the provincial capital of Ilyr's Gate. They are told the job is routine, except that three previous couriers have gone missing on the western road.

Category: Economy

- The receipts issued by the station name debts transferred to 'Crown Successor, River Province Magistracy, Aster Table, House Cairnwell.'

Category: Politics

- Vey Lark wrote back to Commander Holt asserting that cooperation is now the only honest containment regarding the waking stations.
- Magistrate Tor is framing the party publicly for a conspiracy to fabricate plague records.
- The party's proposal for road governance rejected crown-only control and secret hereditary tables, opting instead for a public charter board.
- A public charter board was accepted as an auditable compromise for road governance, including representatives from the church, merchants, Aster, crown, and local witnesses, with ledgers open to inspection on set days.
- Public pamphlets in Ilyr's Gate present three positions: plague truth, anti-Ardwine conspiracy, and 'roads cannot commit crimes because roads are roads.'
- The party debated accountability and the recording of truths regarding the western account station, leading to the discovery of a sealed brass order tube containing a false order signed by General Odran Vale. The order commanded Blackstone to move 'unrecorded detainees' west and deny all passage afterward. The party decided to copy the true order into three ledgers and assign crown responsibility through current magistracy, with Aster and Cairnwell signing as negligent custodians. This action triggered a fight with the station's defenses, including bailiffs and a debt collector, while Lady Cairn fought alongside the party. They completed two of three ledger copies before the session ended with the third copy unfinished and the station beginning to collapse.
- Magistrate Iven Tor accused the party of burglary, assault, and possession of sealed military records.
- Mara Renn was taken west to reconcile the western account by the Sable Clerk and a veiled woman. The road now prefers signatures, names, and sworn obligations over coin for under-road payments. The Aster Table has been using modern families' seals without consent for maintenance payments.
- Lady Cairn wants witnesses remembered, not simply silenced. Magistrates are moving to seize rescued witnesses. Glass Quay has enough illegal activity that 'audit' caused panic. Kestrel is now 'ledger fox' to Lady Cairn's people.
- The party made their public return to Ilyr's Gate by joining a River Saint procession for the high-water blessing, arranged by Elian with Deacon Marot. They faced Magistrate Tor's guards at the west bridge, where Elian demanded sanctuary passage in front of festival-goers. The crowd shifted in their favor as Bera and Old Sen made their statements. Kestrel distributed copies of the Glass Quay account numbers. At the cathedral, they presented corrected church ledger copies and brass receipts, which branded 'received under protest' into the altar wood. Tor arrived with city guards, accusing everyone of treason, while Lysa countered with merchant charter law. Lady Cairn revealed her signet scar and confessed to abductions, implicating Tor's office in laundering debt. The session ended with Tor ordering Lady Cairn seized and the cathedral bells ringing unnaturally.
- The party accepted the role of temporary auditors of imperial road debt after discovering that their original courier contract had been rewritten to bind them into the road's accounting chain. They agreed to fulfill this role until the public account is delivered and living captives are freed, which calmed the Brackenford toll office and recognized their status as auditors. The session ended with the realization that they must complete the entire account, not just rescue their friends.

Category: Magic Systems

- The party learned that invoking auditor authority risks personal memories, as demonstrated when Tovin lost the memory of the name of his first teacher for about ten minutes after using it.
- Mara visited Harl Brunn, a swordsmith, who recognized the frost mark on her blade as 'oath frost' and refused to grind it off due to the potential consequences of old road magic. This made Mara nervous, as she had been treating the roadwarden lie lightly.

- The party established rules for using their auditor powers: no casual auditing, always close books, and never speak full names near open ledgers unless necessary.
- The imperial seal may function as a contract ward and was shown to the roadwarden echoes by the party during their encounter.
- The toll arches respond to identity and obligations, not just names.

Category: World Artifacts

- The Glass Quay has an under-road spur that connects to the river bridge, which is significant for its strategic importance. Meren Halst was rescued from a counting cell, where he was forced to reconcile Ardwine records against road receipts. Pell Ardwine was observed in a brass-framed account mirror, indicating his office is compromised by an active road station under Brackenford's toll marker. The party sealed the Glass Quay spur with a silver abacus, causing it to collapse and cut off that access point.
- The party discovered that every seventeenth notch on the shepherd's tally board was carved deeper than the others, indicating significance. Vey explained that some Aster families used counting rhymes to remember dangerous mile intervals, but she only knew children's versions.
- The captured Cairnwell agent carried a token for The Glass Quay, an upscale riverside counting club in Ilyr's Gate, where minor nobles gamble on shipping contracts.
- The party formally closed their temporary auditor contract at the original Brackenford milestone. The Sable Clerk appeared as writing on stone, not a person, and marked their obligation complete. It did not thank them. It simply recorded them. Mara left Odran's rusted button at the milestone. Elian added the names of the known Sable Year dead and living survivors to the church ledger. Bran let Button eat one blue aster despite being told not to. Nothing terrible happened.
- The party discovered a hidden waystation beneath an imperial milestone, where they found the skeletal remains of three couriers killed by crossbow bolts. They also found a locked iron dispatch tube containing page 17 from a Blackstone quartermaster ledger, which listed civilian copyists retained under emergency authority, including Mara Renn, and ongoing ration allotments for sealed personnel below road grade.
- Ardwine seals were stolen twice in the last decade and covered up to maintain credit with river houses.
- The party found a gold coin bearing the old imperial sunburst, which Kestrel took despite her hand burning, and it now hurts when she lies about not having it.
- The party has divided brass receipts among themselves for safety.
- Meren Halst, an elderly clerk, confirmed that page 17 is missing from six different ledgers spanning 90 years and that the handwriting on later Blackstone supply entries does not match any known clerk, appearing in books that should have been stored in different rooms.
- The party found a half-rotted toll ledger from 138 years ago with page 17 missing, and the last readable entry mentioned 'military traffic sealed under Crown silence.'
- Elian discovered a sealed prayer niche behind the altar containing a saint-medal and a confession from an army chaplain.
- The party noted that the ledger case had cooled after the roadwarden echoes accepted it.
- Glass Quay has been shuttered, likely for evidence removal.
- The party has collected black ink from sweating milestone markers.
- Dobb's old prayer book and a blue aster are found at Saint Orlan's shrine, despite Dobb claiming it was packed in his bag. The blue aster is fresh, which contradicts its previous return by Kestrel.
- The party found a buried imperial transit system under the quartermaster building, featuring a vaulted stone corridor with wagon grooves and old imperial mile numbers. They encountered stone mouths that bargain for names and discovered a closure ledger with recent additions that should not exist, including Mara Renn and Pell Ardwine. The session ended with bells ringing somewhere under the road.

Category: NPCs

- Meren Halst has been arrested in the capital, and Magistrate Tor has announced the party as suspects in a conspiracy to fabricate plague records.
- The party took rescued witnesses to the River Saint cathedral through the laundry entrance after Elian convinced Deacon Marot that this was a matter of sanctuary. Dobb stayed with the witnesses as he was exhausted. The Glass Quay investigation involved Kestrel forging an invitation using a token from a captured agent. Inside, they found nobles gambling on projected river tolls. Lady Cairn recognized the party and invited them to bid on an uncollected western account. Tovin won the bid by offering the iron road token as collateral, causing panic at the table. Kestrel snuck into the counting room and found ledgers listing living assets moved between Glass Quay, Blackstone, and Toll-Seventeen-West, alarm bells ringing when she copied the name Mara Renn.
- Lysa Ardwine runs the counting house in Ilyr's Gate and is Pell's older sister. She is composed, annoyed that the players were late, and very interested in the intact seals. Lysa paid the balance of 80 gp but refused to explain the imperial mark. She hired the players because couriers with normal company guards kept disappearing. The original ledger she revealed listed purchases routed to Blackstone Fort for twelve years after official records say it was abandoned. Page 17 is missing from the ledger. Lysa offered the players a second job to find who has been editing historic trade records and why the old fort is appearing in active accounts. They accepted after negotiating access to the Ardwine archive instead of more money. Salla Vint was turned over to Lysa's house security after begging not to be taken to the magistrates. Tovin researched Sable Year and found that every public account says a plague emptied the western forts, but casualty ledgers are sealed by military court order.
- Magistrate Tor was charged locally and marked as a knowing facilitator in the audit process.
- Commander Holt and Sered Holt had an awkward reunion after the party returned from the eastern archive.
- Ollo, the kitchen boy from Glass Quay, returns with a sealed note from Meren, stating that royal auditors are false and are Cairnwell creditors using crown paper.
- Bera Sol identifies Lady Cairn, who wears mourning veils and carries a silver abacus. Holt confirms that House Cairnwell was one of the original road-contract families and was removed from Aster records after a breach of duty. It is revealed that during Sable Year, Blackstone was not hit by plague but by a military cover-up involving the crown moving troops and prisoners secretly. Aster families agreed to hide the crown's actions in exchange for charters and land. The party plans to return to Ilyr's Gate with rescued witnesses, evidence of forged seal payments, and to find Lady Cairn in the capital.
- Magistrate Iven Tor stonewalled the party's request to inspect military records, becoming nervous when the River Saint cathedral and Blackstone were mentioned. He claimed the plague records were sealed for public safety, leading the party to believe there was no plague. Kestrel discovered a rejected petition from Dobb Renn to exhume his daughter, Mara Renn, whose grave was found to be empty except for an iron road token. The veiled woman attempted to buy the token and notes for 500 gp, but combat ensued after Bran shot first, and she escaped using a smoke bead, leaving behind blue aster petals.
- The party reached Toll-Seventeen-West, where they encountered Lady Cairn, who offered a bargain for Mara Renn and the other retained copyists. Mara Renn refused to leave without the others, and Lady Cairn warned that releasing them could destabilize the under-road. Kestrel offered her theft ledger page instead of the closure page, leading to a partial acceptance from the road, resulting in stairs descending to the western account station.
- A noble creditor tried to flee with a box of name slips but was tackled by Kestrel into a fountain.
- Corven Mott admits he ferried two veiled passengers west a month ago and lied earlier because they paid in real gold and scared him.
- Magistrate Tor is under house arrest in a cathedral guest cell and is frightened, claiming that he may be useful despite nobody believing he is innocent.
- Auditor-Marshal Caul captured a fragment of the Sable Clerk and uses it as an authentication engine. He offered the party a deal to sign his charter as field auditors in exchange for pardons and crown compensation for victims, but negotiations ended when the party questioned who would be erased from civil life. The party stopped two filings but Caul completed one for provisional crown custody of the Ilyr's Gate under-road switch. The session ended with the city bells ringing as the vault shifted and the west bridge route activated.

- The party was followed by two dock toughs who were hired by a veiled woman with a scent of crushed flowers to learn if the party had opened a case. The toughs fled after Mara cracked one's cudgel during a confrontation in an alley.
- The party encountered a merchant wagon driven by Pash, who carried a sealed parcel addressed to Pell Ardwine in Brackenford. Inside the parcel was a blank page that filled with Kestrel's handwriting, listing everything they had stolen since Session 1. Pash may have been a moving dead drop.
- Lady Cairn was sentenced to public service under the charter board rather than execution, which split the table but made sense after her cooperation. Tor is awaiting trial and trying to blame Caul. Caul was taken by royal escort in chains, but Advocate Sui quietly warned the party that central court may prefer a sealed trial.
- Dobb Renn is a traveling tinker who sold the party lamp oil, chalk, and a dented tea kettle, and has a daughter buried near Ilyr's Gate.
- The five-ledger crosscheck method was designed by the party, involving the road ledger, church ledger, Ardwine ledger, Aster closure ledger, and crown charter draft, all opened together with the silver abacus and one brass receipt from each debtor category. The Sable Clerk fragment manifested during the audit, revealing contradictions including the status of Commander Holt's brother, Sered Holt, who may be alive under Caul's custody.
- Caul escaped deeper through a crown route, revealing ink-black veins from road use. The Sable Clerk fragment was partially freed and accepts qualified truth. Elian was forced to account for staged disclosure, and Kestrel confessed to stealing an imperial gold coin. The crown custody filing was amended to contested custody, and the glass account frame was cracked, allowing the Sable Clerk to speak in its own voice.
- Copyists are bound by ledger entries, not chains, and if work stops, the road consumes memories. During Sable Year, the crown moved prisoners west under 'relief supplies' but abandoned them when the route malfunctioned. The official account lists them as plague dead, but the road ledger still marks them as in transit.
- Holt singing badly is now established as canon, despite not being foreshadowed.
- Sered Holt is alive in an eastern holding archive, time-displaced and blind in one eye. Caul has illegal custody of him and can redirect debt onto bystanders with black-glove magic. Advocate Sui has formally suspended Caul pending inquiry, which affects his authority over road filings. Kestrel stole Caul's personal seal, and Mara took a debt mark to protect Ollo during a chaotic public brawl.
- Old Sen, Jala, and Brother Cam are copyists who were freed, with varying recovery; Old Sen remembered his wife's name for the first time in years, while Jala and Brother Cam could walk out.
- The Sable Clerk is a shadowy imperial record entity who wants accurate accounts.
- Auditor-Marshal Caul is a crown investigator who arrived in Ilyr's Gate months before the party's original job and now seeks to take control of the awakened road under direct crown authority.
- The party encounters road pilgrims at Saint Orlan's shrine who ask about the relief of Blackstone. Mara answers that the account has been corrected in part. One pilgrim gives her a rusted officer's button marked with Odran Vale's unit, which causes her frost-marked sword to thaw slightly afterward.
- Mara Renn is freed from active obligation but still changed, having aged back somewhat but not fully, and now looks older than she should.
- The roadwarden echoes are old oath-bound guardians that enforce ancient travel laws and demanded 'manifest, seal, and road right' from the party.
- Magistrate Tor is in custody marked by road debt. Lady Cairn is protected for testimony. Meren Halst is confirmed held under Glass Quay. Tor had prewritten illegal arrest orders. The cathedral sits over an under-road line. Mara Vale may be tied by blood to Odran Vale's debt. The party's immediate goal is to rescue Meren.
- Jory gave the name 'Blue Aster,' which is thought to be a person but is likely to become a sign or symbol. Payment for bandit activities came through a dead drop at an old milestone south of Harrow Bend. The party found a hollow under the cracked imperial marker containing two clipped silver coins, blue thread, and a scrap of vellum with the number 17 written in bookkeeping shorthand. Tovin detected a faint abjuration trace from the marker itself. The milestone is recognized as one of the saint-road markers built over older pilgrim stones. The party detoured to Harrow Bend, where they met Corven Mott, the ferryman, who mentioned two riders crossed three nights ago with a covered cart and no visible horse. The party found black silt caked under the ferry landing. They encountered four 'drowned rats' in Corven's grain shed, which had bits of blue thread in their teeth. The session ended with the party agreeing to spend the night in Harrow Bend.

- Tovin lost the memory of his favorite childhood meal for the rest of the session after asking a door for necessary passage to prevent false filing.
- Dobb Renn joins the party as a noncombatant, looking for the truth about his daughter, Mara Renn, who vanished five years ago.
- Corven Mott lied about the party drowning to protect them.
- Salla Vint is a prisoner who provided useful smuggling information to the party during their travel session from Harrow Bend toward Ilyr's Gate.
- Old Mother Wren successfully sheltered witnesses, including Bera.
- Nessa, the innkeeper of the Three Eels, reports that Pell has been writing without sleep and is receiving instructions from 'the west mirror.'
- Lady Cairn cooperated with the party and surrendered the silver abacus to Elian, warning that public truth will make powerful families desperate.
- Hal is alive but confused, showing evidence of under-road time effects.
- The party helps a farmer named Tamm with a broken wagon axle, receiving apples as a reward. Button eats too many apples and feels mildly sick afterward.
- The party captured a blue-lacquer scout named Vey Lark, who works for a private society called the Aster Table, which claims an inherited duty to contain Blackstone. Vey revealed that Blackstone Fort is not abandoned but occupied by blue-coated guards. The party also encountered thorn goblins living in the moat, who demanded tolls to cross and warned about the 'stone mouths' that sing at night.
- Caul was publicly exposed and held for his crimes, including custody crimes related to the Sable Year orders.
- Brother Cam helps Elian draft a church testimony ledger.
- Lady Cairn accepted liability for recent abductions but received credit for cooperation and surrendered an abacus as part of a public account.
- Meren Halst identified the handwriting in the Glass Quay entries as matching an impossible hand from old ledgers.
- Hal has recovered but is mentally and time-displaced after vanishing for a week. He was found writing the line 'relief delayed by order of sealed command.'
- Yip-of-the-Root returned the thorn-charmed tea kettle and demanded a hero tax from the party because they returned with more people than they left with.
- Ollo wants to be Kestrel's apprentice, but Kestrel quickly denies this.
- Lady Cairn can contact the party through road, fog, and milestone effects, offering to trade Mara Renn for the closure ledger page at Toll-Seventeen-West.
- Old Mother Wren claims the road has been 'talking in its sleep' for three nights and recognizes Vey's blue coat, implying older locals remember Aster Table activity more than official history says.
- Lysa Ardwine invoked merchant charter immunity during a confrontation with Magistrate Tor.
- Elian visited the River Saint cathedral and learned that Saint Orlan's shrine predates the church by at least 400 years, which annoyed the deacon she asked.
- Salla Vint claimed to be a tax investigator for the capital and had forged papers.
- Kestrel's burned hand now shows faint ledger lines when she lies about theft.
- Commander Holt's family has guarded Blackstone for five generations, and his brother disappeared below the road fifteen years ago.
- Meren became interim record master for the charter board and is insufferably pleased. Lysa kept Ardwine afloat but lost some charter privileges pending review. Pell returned to Brackenford and refuses to sit with his back to a ledger shelf.

Dobb and Mara Renn moved slowly toward repairing their relationship; she is not 'fine,' but she is alive and copying only when she chooses. Vey returned to Blackstone with a stack of public procedures and a promise from Bran to visit for another terrible play. Holt and Sered went back together, still awkward.

Category: Non-Government Organizations

- Lysa Ardwine offers supplies to the party if they go west to Blackstone to find proof regarding the disappearance of clerks.

Category: Inhabitants

- Aster families are isolated by inherited duty, as shown by Vey Lark's curiosity about life outside their posts.

Category: Ecosystems

- The party camped in the uplands where natural blue asters were found growing near the old road. The blue asters closed at sunset all at once, and the thorn-charmed kettle was whistling without heat.

Category: Races

- Mara may be a collateral descendant of General Odran Vale, as one collateral branch of the Vale family settled in the same border district she came from.

Category: Regions

- The old western road used to run straight to Blackstone Fort before the crown rerouted traffic south after the 'Sable Year.'
- The under-road extends beneath Ilyr's Gate and river bridges, and there is a hidden clerk dormitory that was occupied recently. Aster Table may have stopped paying/maintaining road obligations, and a current ration chit suggests living people nearby.

Category: Player Characters

- The party is currently at level 4 and is in Brackenford, ready to enter the active toll office.
- The party left the capital under pressure, taking Vey, Dobb, Bera, and a packet of Ardwine credit notes.
- The party reached level 3 after a long rest and made their level-up choices at the table.
